Summary

- Civil engineering students embarked on a field project involving the preparation of 15 concrete benches for the Siddhartha Educational Academy Group of Institution campus. The project entailed the utilization of M20 grade concrete, which is a standard concrete mix with a characteristic compressive strength of 20 megapascals (MPa) after 28 days of curing.
- The students likely began by conducting a thorough analysis of the requirements, including the dimensions of the benches, the quantity of materials needed, and the necessary tools and equipment for construction. Following this, they would have prepared a detailed plan outlining the step-by-step process for constructing the concrete benches.
- The preparation process involved the accurate mixing of cement, sand, aggregates, and water to achieve the desired M20 grade concrete mix. The students would have ensured proper proportions of each component to maintain the structural integrity and durability of the benches.
- After mixing the concrete, the students would have poured it into molds designed to shape the benches according to the desired specifications. They would have taken care to properly vibrate the concrete to remove air voids and ensure uniform distribution within the molds.
- Once poured, the concrete would have been left to cure for a specified period, typically around 28 days, to achieve its full strength. During this time, the students would have monitored the curing process and taken necessary precautions to protect the benches from any potential damage or disturbance.
- Upon completion of the curing period, the concrete benches would have been carefully demolded and inspected for quality assurance. Any necessary finishing touches or adjustments would have been made to ensure that the benches met the required standards and specifications.
- Overall, the field project undertaken by the civil engineering students involved meticulous planning, precise execution, and diligent quality control measures to successfully prepare 15 concrete benches of M20 grade for their college campus.
